The Voith plant maintains close contact with the Rakosi Works in Budapest. In June 1954, when USIA headquarters learned that the Rakosi Works required a much shorter time than Voith for production of identical machine parts, several engineers were sent from Voith to the Budapest plant. Their instructions were to determine if the quality of the machines produced by Rakosi measured up to those made at Voith. The engineers confined themselves to the finding that Voith works with harder steel than Rakosi.
